Learning Efficacy of Multimedia in Interactive Augmented Reality Environments

Augmented Reality is an incipient technology rooted in traditional multimedia with attractive applications for education. Mobile devices travel with billions of people globally, and the inherently mobile nature of AR, with its simple and inexpensive implementation relative to the potentialities exhibited for pervasive, personal, and connected learning, indicates that it is poised to supplement the future of multimodal educational dissemination. The present study explored the learning efficacy of multimedia forms within interactive augmented reality environments. The results are important for confirming academic quality when employing emergent practices. This information may be of value for educators, instructional designers, and learners seeking to utilize empirical evidence as the basis of educational design decisions and learning strategies. The study isolated media types within AR experiences and evaluated their efficacy for learning.

Adaptive Learning Design Implications: Effects of Multimedia on Learning Efficacy and Cognitive Load

An experimental and data-driven study to inform effective adaptive learning domain model development decisions with an incipient exploration of cognitive load and learning efficacy when utilizing multimedia stimuli. These platforms' systems rely on sophisticated feedback from human interaction, educational theory, learning analytics, and educational data mining. The pilot comprised an overview of the proposed research, relevant literature on orthogonal and intersecting agendas, imbricated methodological experimentation, data processing, and anticipated challenges. Results demonstrate that media types and combinations of media exhibit varying cognitive load, consequently impacting learning efficacy.
